2. Online education is no longer confined to traditional institutions. It's like a global classroom where everyone is invited. Educators from various backgrounds are creating their own unique courses. This variety of methods is what makes online learning so engaging today.
3. Educators also address important social issues, including accessibility and equity. They use their platforms to discuss things like digital literacy, internet access, and educational disparities. When global events like pandemics occurred, many educators stepped up and supported the cause of accessible learning. They want to improve education through their online courses.
4. Technology is an important element in online education, too. Educators are like tech innovators. These instructors utilize advanced tools and create engaging content to enhance learning. What they develop can become a standard for many learners. It’s not just about delivering information; it’s about fostering a dynamic learning environment.
5. Social media, like YouTube and online forums, is a big part of online education today. Educators can interact with their students directly and show what they are teaching. It’s like having a live Q&A with your favorite instructor. They use these platforms to share their lessons and connect with people who are eager to learn.
6. While there are some aspects that could be improved in the current online education landscape, it cannot be denied that online learning is transforming our world. If learners

Câu 53 - 60: Questions 23-30: Read the passage carefully.

1. Cyberbullying, social comparison, and information overload: all three of these modern challenges have caused widespread anxiety since the rise of social media, and all three of them stem from the constant connectivity and curated perfection that we are bombarded with to maintain our online presence. The more we scroll, the more we are exposed to content which triggers insecurities and negative emotions likely transferred to our mental well-being.
2. Limiting social media usage will not only reduce feelings of inadequacy but also control the spread of a long list of mental health issues that have emerged from digital environments, including depression, anxiety, insomnia, loneliness, and so on. A 2020 study found that a 20 percent increase in social media usage would raise depression symptoms by 5.5 percent; that would be millions of people worldwide. Meanwhile, an average of 3 hours per day are spent on social media by young adults, and there is no sign of a slowdown.
3. Individuals can take numerous steps to prevent the harm. Engaging in real-life activities, which improves our overall happiness anyway, will lessen the need for online validation. Practicing mindfulness will reduce the demand for constant notifications, much of which is designed to keep us hooked. Spending more time in nature can boost our mood without the need for digital stimulation.
4. In the meantime, platforms should implement stricter content moderation, where harmful content like cyberbullying and misinformation are repeatedly filtered out. The algorithms may be commercially important, but the risk is too great. Platforms must also ban addictive design features, which can spread unhealthy habits far and wide. In addition, developers must examine personalized feeds that pack endless streams of content – the source of the 2018 study that linked excessive social media use to mental health decline in young adults.
5. Hopefully, reducing social media's negative impact and promoting mental wellness can guarantee healthier lives, stronger relationships, responsible technology consumption and production, sustainably managed digital spaces, and mindful online actions. The current mental health crisis is a catastrophe, but it calls for our attention on the human achievements by not overexploiting the digital world.
